WHOLE EARTH REVIEW MARKS 25th ANNIVERSARY!

Whole Earth Review (#70989-39594) celebrates 25 years in publication with a Summer, 1993 issue that is bursting with the provocative and intelligent editorial that has been the title's trademark for a quarter of a century. On sale June 8 and priced at $6.75 U.S./$7.50 Canada, this milestone anniversary issue explores the literate to the lunatic, including :

•The Third Wave: Twenty-four years ago a high school teacher innocently invited his students to try on the discipline of Nazi-style obedience melodrama. To the teacher's horror, the students loved it and what began as an experiment spun out of control, taking over the school. The subject of countless news articles, an international bestseller, theatrical performances and a television drama, the publicity the story has received has created a story of its own. Whole Earth Review tells that story: the shame, the silence, the wrenching side effects.

•Acting Lessons: Whole Earth Review founder Steward Brand learns from famed actor Peter Coyote how to be himself--but better--in an acting lesson that is actually a look at being real.

•Electronic Privacy: Digital encryption, digital cash... In the next few years these will be hot issues in the areas of citizens rights, of crime, and of finance both personal and global. Whole Earth Review lets you learn about them now because by the time they hit mainstream attention, rights may be usurped, communication pathways co-opted and channeled and a new Willie Sutton may be frolicking in your bank account.

Plus, Whole Earth Review looks at the unsung heroes of our times: video game designers, explores the benefits of bringing serious consideration to wholly repressed "unthinkable" thoughts and presents the perverse "future" imaginings of Whole Earth Review Editor Kevin Kelly and British musician Brian Eno.
